

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

A storage device has a capability of learning access patterns by which a plurality of computers access to the device. The storage device stores a specific access history for each computer and causes a management computer to report a type of file access. This allows the storage device to save information in a cache memory before start of a file access to be executed by the computer.